

Lieberman gets national intelligence medal for extraordinary service

December 14, 2012

By Mark Rockwell
Government Security News

The nation's chief intelligence officer bestowed retiring chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee Sen. Joe Lieberman (I-CT) with the intelligence community's highest recognition for those who are not part of the community.

At a Dec. 11 ceremony in the senate committee's hearing room, Director of National Intelligence James Clapper said the Lieberman was awarded the National Intelligence Distinguished Public Service Medal for his "extraordinary service to the nation" and for being "a steadfast ally of the intelligence community."

...

Continue reading at Government Security News