Greater prosperity tends to increase the intensity and effectiveness of political participation. As people become wealthier, they often express rising economic and social expectations in terms of material benefits, such as better health care, housing, or education, that governments are often not in a position to provide expeditiously.